EMPIRE of LIGHT

From Academy Award®-winning director and writer Sam Mendes, EMPIRE OF LIGHT is a moving drama about the power of human connection during turbulent times. Set in and around a faded old cinema in an English coastal town in the early 1980s, it follows Hilary (Olivia Colman) a cinema manager struggling with her mental health, and Stephen (Micheal Ward), a new employee who longs to escape this provincial town in which he faces daily adversity. Both Hilary and Stephen find a sense of belonging through their unlikely and tender relationship and come to experience the healing power of music, cinema, and community.

Searchlight Pictures presents EMPIRE OF LIGHT written and directed by Sam Mendes. The film features a stellar cast led by Olivia Colman, Micheal Ward, Tom Brooke, Tanya Moodie, Hannah Onslow, Crystal Clarke, with Toby Jones, and Colin Firth.

The filmmaking team includes longstanding Mendes' collaborators including Producer Pippa Harris, Director of Photography Roger Deakins, who reunites with Mendes for his fifth collaboration, Production Designer Mark Tildesley, Costume Designer Alexandra Byrne, Hair and Make Up Designer Naomi Donne, Editor Lee Smith, Sound Mixer Wilson, Casting Director Nina Gold, Music Supervisor Randall Poster, Composers Trent Reznor and Atticus Ross, Executive Producers Michael Lerman and Julie Pastor, and Co-Producers Celia Duval and Lola Oliyide.

ABOUT THE FILM

Academy Award® winner Sam Mendes (1917, Revolutionary Road, Road to Perdition, Jarhead, American Beauty) writes and directs EMPIRE OF LIGHT: “For most people, their most formative period is their teenage years. For me, that was the late ’70s and early ’80s: the music, the movies, the pop culture of that period generally formed who I was. It was a period of great political upheaval in the U.K., with a great deal of very incendiary racial politics – but at the same time, an amazing period for music and for culture generally – very creative, very politicized, very energized. EMPIRE OF LIGHT itself, however, is a movie almost entirely born out of the pandemic. Lockdown was a period of intense self-examination and reflection for all of us. And for me it meant starting to confront these memories that I’d been wrestling with since childhood. That was the spur to write – to explore those memories and to see if I could unlock anything interesting.”

“Movies deal in mythic landscapes,” Mendes continues. “You’re always looking for a point where the past becomes somehow bigger in scale, and greater in theme, and more fabled than the present. Looking back now, this period in England seemed to me one where the intersection of racial politics and music and movies was particularly special and unusual.”

Mendes has created two characters, Hilary and Stephen, played by Academy Award® winner Olivia Colman (The Favourite, The Lost Daughter) and rising star Micheal Ward (“Top Boy”, Lovers Rock), and has woven them into a story exploring some of the ties that bring us together – the music, the movies, and the makeshift families that get us through. At the center of EMPIRE OF LIGHT is their relationship – though they seem different in every conceivable way, they find a rite of passage that brings them both some degree of happiness and strength.

One of the first people Mendes shared the EMPIRE OF LIGHT screenplay with was producer Pippa Harris, who he worked with on 1917 and Revolutionary Road, and with whom he founded Neal Street Productions twenty years ago. Harris found the story and context very moving. “This is the first screenplay Sam has written completely from scratch on his own, with no input from another writer. The writing, particularly the delineation of the characters, was extraordinary. This story of a lost soul who finds a strange family within the cinema – I found it truly moving.” Having personally dealt with mental illness within his own family, Mendes based the character on his own formative memories.

“Hilary is a middle-aged woman who lives alone on the coast and has worked in the cinema for a few years,” Mendes explains. “She has a complicated past and some demons of her own but, in the way that ad hoc families can support each other, she has been embraced by this eccentric bunch that work in the cinema. She’s struggling to find a meaningful relationship in her life, when Stephen, who is open-hearted and gentle but still very young, also comes to work there.”

Mendes says that the part of Hilary was written for Colman. As he started writing the screenplay during the pandemic, he says, he was watching “The Crown.” “And there was Olivia being brilliant, and I thought, ‘Oh, that’s who should play Hilary.’ I didn’t particularly know Olivia – but I started writing it with her very much in mind.”

For Colman, the idea that Mendes was writing a part for her was “quite surreal,” she says. “I had been a drama student going to the Donmar, knowing all about Sam and American Beauty. But I didn’t know Sam at all when my agent called and said Sam Mendes wants to do a Zoom. Ohhhhhhhhhhhkay.”

Though Colman may have been nervous or intimidated, she needn’t have been. “I don’t know what I was expecting, but he really is so gentle and so kind,” she says. On set, she saw that reflected in the way he directs. “He’ll hold people’s hands. He knows how to speak to every single person in a way that is understanding to them. He’ll become the character – he’ll talk to me like Hilary might, or move like she might.”

Mendes comments, “Olivia is very available and open, and yet also somehow mysterious. For me, that’s what makes her so extraordinary, along with her amazing skill.”

Micheal Ward says that when he first read the script – even before he was cast in the role – Mendes asked for his input on the character. “It was good for Sam to do that,” he says. “He didn’t need to – I’m a new actor, I haven’t been doing this long. But he valued my opinion – it was exciting to know that he was willing to collaborate on the character. Sam lived through that period, but he recognizes he’s not a Black man, and so while he would have seen the tension around him, he wouldn’t know what that walk was like himself.”

If moviegoers see echoes of the current moment in Mendes’ period piece from the 1980s, that’s no coincidence. “In the middle of lockdown there was a racial reckoning in the world. We were left alone to contemplate how our own racial politics had been formed, and whether we had fallen down in our attempts to make sure the world was evolving. When I wrote the movie there was also another common obsession: we were all worried whether the cinema was going to die, along with live performances. So, all of those things have gone into this movie, and in that regard, it’s quite raw,” he says.

Harris also hears other echoes in the screenplay to the current moment. “The relationship between Colin Firth’s (The King’s Speech, A Single Man) Mr. Ellis and Hilary is obviously quite demeaning for her, but one she feels she has to go along with, and again, that’s something that we see replicated around the world still today. So, on one level, you look at EMPIRE OF LIGHT and it feels as though it's a world away, and yet on another level, we still see the themes every day in contemporary life."

The film is a remembrance for more than just Mendes, but also for his friends since childhood – Harris and actor Toby Jones (Tinker Tailor Soldier Spy), who plays the role of Norman, the projectionist. "The first time I remember seeing Sam was, coincidentally, with Toby Jones," continues Harris. "We grew up in Oxfordshire in the 1980s. I was about fourteen, and they were a little bit older, maybe sixteen. We had gone to a rather insalubrious party in a village hall, and across the crowded dance floor I see these two little figures in their rather sharp, natty suits with their little pork pie hats on, and they were dancing, bizarrely, to some of the music that is in this film – I think it was The Specials. I just thought they looked really great, and they were friends of friends, and we all got talking, and the rest is history."

The songs that populate the film are the soundtrack of Mendes' life and a key part of the film. "The politics of the period – especially the racial politics, Thatcher's 'there's no such thing as society', the racism of Enoch Powell and the National Front, the Brixton riots, the Toxteth riots, the high unemployment and extreme divisiveness – all fed into the music and the culture of the period," says Mendes. "Stephen loves and adores The Specials, and The Beat, and The Selecter and all the two-tone recording artists - that particular meeting of ska and punk, which was in its heyday. Those diverse bands were able to make great music whilst still being politically relevant. Songs about unemployment, and the death of the inner cities, about teenage pregnancy, and kids who had nothing to do but drink, and about Thatcher... a song like 'Ghost Town', for example, could go straight to number one. Those songs were part of the popular culture, and those bands were a great creative melting pot of black and white that has never quite been achieved again."

CREATING THE CHARACTERS

At the beginning of the story, Hilary, played by Olivia Colman, has come out of a mental health episode that has put her on medication. "She doesn't really feel anything very strongly," says Colman. "She's going through the motions at work, going through the motions with Mr. Ellis. She lives alone, doesn't speak to anyone – it's a pretty lonely existence, and she wants more. She wants to feel more."

That is when Micheal Ward's Stephen enters her life. "She's dazzled by him," she continues, explaining that the relationship changes her life. "She transforms, from feeling nothing, to feeling tingles. And she comes off her medication and then goes through phases to a point where she's heroic in her mania. I loved playing Hilary because of the different emotional states that we find her in."

Hilary is a woman living with mental illness, and together, Mendes and Colman bring her to life with sensitivity, nuance, gentleness, and complexity. “Sam is so emotionally engaged,” says Colman, noting the special quality that comes through in all of his work. “He understands what kindness is and that it is needed. What she’s going through is not her fault, and you can see the triggers that set her off when she has an episode.”

Simultaneously, Ward’s character Stephen must walk through a racist world – whether it’s by a reactionary government or violent youths – but keeps true to himself as he finds an unlikely connection with Hilary, and with the cinema itself. “He’s been rejected by universities and he’s at a crossroads and trying to find himself,” says Ward. “When something like that is taken away from you, you have to find something else that fulfills you. He’s a young Black man, excited by the opportunities in life; he loves people, loves to connect with music and movies, and he refuses to allow an oppressive society to define who he is.”

Mendes says that Stephen is relentlessly positive, even with everything he faces, from Thatcherite politics that limit his opportunities to skinhead violence that poses a daily threat. “He’s a glass half-full person,” explains the director. “Stephen is not naïve – the racism that he experiences is real and hurtful in so many ways – but he doesn’t let his trauma define him.”

“For Stephen, the film is a coming-of-age story, where he’s finding himself and his place in this world,” says Ward. “But for me, when I first read the script, my reaction was focused on how much of an impact the character could have – not just in the story, but for a lot of young Black people. It’s so important for them to see themselves in something like this, because then they realize everyone’s stories are relevant and worth telling.”

Ward says that the relationship between Stephen and Hilary is a unique exchange as each helps the other to grow. “Stephen gives Hilary a lot of optimism, a lot of love, a lot of enthusiasm, exposure to different culture and art, and his experiences,” says Ward. “She gives him her perspective, life impression, her love of poetry and words, and just simple encouragement. She sees him. They both have been slightly ostracized from society, and that connective tissue draws them together, whether they realize it or not. It’s an exchange of energies and love. They give each other things that they don’t even know they need. Hilary has never met anyone like Stephen before, and that allows her to figure out who she is as a person as well.”

Academy Award® winner Colin Firth, who previously starred for Mendes in 1917, takes on the role of Mr. Ellis, the manager of the theater. A man who uses and abuses the people around him, Ellis especially takes advantage of Hilary’s fragile state. “Sam and I talked quite a bit about the relationship between Ellis and Hilary, because the short answer is, he’s a predator,” says Firth. “He’s unfaithful to his wife, he doesn’t have Hilary’s best interests at heart. The way he treats her is atrocious.”

How does one play such a despicable a character? “My job as an actor is find why he is the way he is,” he says. “I think he is frustrated – he dreamed of bigger things professionally. I do think he cares for his wife and Hilary, or believes he does. But he's not really fluent in the language of consent – and that's especially apparent in a man of his age at that time.”

But if Ellis is particularly selfish, Hilary is surrounded by a group of people – a makeshift family at the cinema – who give her the support she needs. In particular, the characters of Norman and Neil are loyal friends to Hilary, which they manifest by simply being accepting of her. “It is a family of outsiders and misfits and outcasts. They don't quite fit anywhere else but somehow within the walls of that cinema they become a kind of family. Norman, Neil– they love Hilary and they're going to look after her, in a way, and she's going to look after them.”

Toby Jones takes the role of Norman, the projectionist. “He's an old-school projectionist – it's a very skilled job and he takes it incredibly seriously. Because he has to change reels every fifteen minutes, he pretty much lives constantly in the projection room, where he has to attend each film,” explains Jones. “What we find out is that – like many of the characters – he has found a refuge in the cinema.” And it is that inspiring space, he says, that gives him a kind of empathy or understanding of Hilary's troubled mind. “He loves film, and he's an enigma... until he isn't.”

Today, the art of film projection has largely passed to digital, but Norman is part of a time when films were projected by a skilled professional using two machines, with celluloid passing by an arclight, watching for secret signals to switch reels. Because Norman has been projecting films for decades, it was necessary for Jones to master the art. “There's an element of timing in it, as you switch between projectors, and of careful manipulation – how you hook up the celluloid as it passes through the projector. You can't learn 20 years of skill, but I learned enough to make me look better than I am!”

Continues Mendes, “People talk a lot about shooting on film dying, but for me, the big loss is film projection. The projectionist gives the movie to the audience, and it's that sense that even if there's only one person out there in the dark, they know there's someone up there showing them the film, giving it to them. You talk to the projectionists and for them, they are part of the filmmaker's world. They see themselves as the last link in the chain. If they are projecting Lawrence of Arabia, they feel they are representing David Lean.”

Tom Brooke, who previously acted in Mendes' 2014 production of “King Lear” at the National Theatre, says that the first scene he filmed as Neil, the theater's junior manager, was also his favorite – and the most challenging he would face on the movie. “The script says, ‘Neil entertains everybody.’ Everybody finds Neil hilarious. You've got to be funny, and you've got to be funny all day. If you do forty takes, you've still got to be funny. So I prepped it – ad-libs, tweaks, a range of pitches, voices, sounds – all kinds of stuff that would keep it light and moving.”

Hannah Onslow (“This is Going to Hurt”) takes the role of Janine, another worker at the cinema. “She's eighteen years old, in that in-between stage of being a teenager and becoming an adult,” says the actress. “It's a turning point in her life and she doesn't really know what she wants to do, so she's focusing on simple things – music, going out with friends and looking for a boyfriend. Like Hilary, she forms quite a strong relationship with Stephen, but she contrasts with Hilary –

Janine's whole life is ahead of her, while for Hilary, there are a lot of 'could haves' and 'should haves.'"

Playing Ruby, who has an on-again relationship with Stephen, is Crystal Clarke (Assassin's Creed). "Ruby is very carefree," she says. "She represents home, a sense of comfort – something familiar. She was really fun to play, because in most of her scenes with Stephen, there's a bit of flirtation and she's harmonious. It's refreshing to be able to play somebody who's always in a good mood."

Tanya Moodie ("The Man Who Fell to Earth") rounds out the cast as Delia, Stephen's remarkable and unwavering mother. While her son is first-generation British-born, Delia is an immigrant to Britain from Trinidad and her experiences with racism once in the UK caused them both great pain that have conditioned her to be distrustful of white people. Moodie, like Ward, was actively involved in conversations with Mendes to make sure he got it right. "Sam doesn't shy away from tough things," says Moodie. "During the rehearsal weeks, we talked about the elements in the script that we could bring into sharper focus, from my experience, and Micheal's, as an African-Caribbean person. That is what makes Sam a master – he acknowledges, he has the dialogue, and we bring as much input from our authentic experiences into the film and character creation as possible."

ABOUT THE PRODUCTION

EMPIRE OF LIGHT reunites Mendes with one of his most important collaborators: director of photography Roger Deakins (1917, Blade Runner 2049, Skyfall, The Shawshank Redemption), the 15-time Oscar®-nominated and two-time winning cinematographer who now teams with Mendes on their fifth film together.

Deakins describes his process as being very collaborative. "When I read a script, it's the same as if I'd read a novel," he says. "I'm not thinking about the cinematography; I'm involved in the story. I don't want to focus on much until I speak with the director, because it's the director's vision, not mine. Sam and I spent a number of days talking through how to approach this film – it could have been all handheld, like a docudrama, which we did discuss. And I don't know if it was a reaction to 1917, a film where the camera doesn't stop moving, but I think it struck both of us that what felt right for this film was more stylized, more quiet – much more static to allow people the space in a frame."

A career-long user of ARRI cameras, Deakins again called on the company's Alexa large format camera and its Signature Prime lenses, but with a key difference from his experience in filming 1917. "On 1917, we basically used one lens, because that was the whole conceit of doing the film from one perspective. On this film, we've used a wider range of lenses – 35, 40, 47, in that range."

Once that vision was in place, Deakins was very involved in the production, as he always is. “I’m very hands-on on set, and part of the reason I work as I do is I like the camaraderie of working with the crew. I’ve always operated the camera – being on the eyepiece, it’s like I’m seeing something very special for the first time.”

The film was produced on location in Margate, a town on the northern shore of Kent. “I grew up in a seaside town in Southwest England, so this brought a lot back for me,” Deakins notes. “Margate brought a reality to this movie. I think Sam had a slightly different feeling in his mind for the town than some of the other locations we scouted – Brighton and Worthing and Eastbourne... Margate feels more like a Yorkshire seaside town.”

“I was drawn to this particular place because it offered so much opportunity in the scale of the visual landscape,” says Mendes. “It’s where J. M. W. Turner painted most of his famous paintings – he went there because he said that the skies were the finest in Europe. It’s where T. S. Elliot wrote The Waste Land, sitting in a bus shelter just outside of the cinema looking out over the beach and the grey sea that sits beyond. There’s a breadth about the place, which gives it poetry and a cinematic scope.”

But perhaps the biggest reason Mendes chose Margate was it was there that production designer Mark Tildesley (No Time To Die, Phantom Thread, In the Heart of the Sea, 28 Days Later), found Dreamland: a former cinema and ballroom with an impressive art deco exterior attached to a seaside funfair.

When Mendes saw the location, he rewrote the screenplay to match it. Scenes that had been set in a disused balcony were rewritten to take advantage of Dreamland’s ballroom, and a scene at the funfair’s roller rink was added.

The location, which had seen better days, underwent a massive transformation from Tildesley’s team. The theatrical auditorium, which had been converted into a pea green bingo hall, became the Empire’s beautiful cinema: everything inside, from the seats to the material on the walls to the proscenium arch, was installed by Tildesley and his team. Other aspects of the building were refreshed as well – the ballroom was given a much-needed facelift and the art deco ladies’ bathrooms were rebuilt – and then these sets were aged to be period-appropriate. “There’s an extraordinary art deco glory to it – there’s a sense that it was built in the 1930s and now it’s 1980 and it’s beginning to creak and crumble,” says Tildesley. “It’s an analogy with the story – the lead characters are weathered and broken people, and they need care and healing and mending.”

The one important part of Mendes’ vision and story that Dreamland could not accommodate was that it lacked a large art-deco lobby looking over the seascape. But Margate came through with a solution: steps down the street from Dreamland was a large open space where Tildesley could build a set of the lobby interior. “The foyer is a centerpiece – it’s where all of the characters meet. It had to be visually captivating,” says Tildesley. “The feeling you get is coming in from the seafront, which is cold and stormy in winter, into this delicious foyer with loads of sweets and popcorn, and then you watch a movie that takes you off into another world.”

The set's windows and doors looked out over the sea with a view that would match the Dreamland exterior shots. That proved a bit of a challenge for Deakins, but one that he welcomed. "It was basically shooting on a location. Yes, it's a set, but at the seafront, the light's ever changeable and most of the work was in the daytime," says Deakins. "Sam could have built a set on a stage with a greenscreen, but obviously, the downside of that is the naturalism of it. I don't think we would have gotten the realism that we did if we had been a soundstage."

Another key design challenge for Tildesley was to replace Dreamland's neon exterior signage with one announcing the theater as the Empire, as well as giving Deakins enough light to capture the scenes at night. "We took down all of the neon and replaced it with our own, and we rebuilt the front façade – they call it the canopy," says Tildesley. "Then, Roger was wondering how on Earth we were going to light these night scenes, so at his instruction, we installed festoon lights along the entire seafront."

The makeshift studio on the seafront was also where Tildesley would build other sets including the cinema offices, where Mr. Ellis conducts his illicit relationship with Hilary. The projection booth, with moveable walls to accommodate filming, and the interiors of Hilary's and Stephen's apartments, were all built in a hangar at Manston airport nearby. Hilary's flat, in particular, represented a challenge for the design team. "Because Sam wanted to shoot in sequence as much as possible, we had to have everything prepared up front and then redress the set as it occurs in script order," says Tildesley. "The set develops in the same way the story does; we project Hilary's struggles into the set and show a progression as she deteriorates and recovers. Sam had an idea that the character would decide to repaint the room with extraordinary colors – purple and a dark green – and that she got halfway through and gave up. We also decided that she would start to write some of her thoughts on the wall. Those details give her state of mind more than just a messy room – it's character-driven."

THE MUSIC OF EMPIRE OF LIGHT

Mendes' film is filled with music of the era – key songs hand-picked by Mendes, many from his formative years growing up in the UK that Stephen and the young staff at the Empire listen to. These songs from the early 80s, along with folk tracks from the late 60's and early 70's that Mendes chose for the music Hilary listens to at home, accompany a score composed by two-time Oscar® winners Trent Reznor and Atticus Ross.

"I've always felt the 80s were an incredibly prolific and extraordinary time in music, you had a number of different forces all coalescing around the same time," says Mendes. "Everyone had a clique: some were floppy haired New Romantics, some were wearing their two-tone suits, some were into heavy metal, some were Goths like Janine in the movie, listening to Joy Division and Siouxsie and the Banshees and The Cure."

Songs that feature in the film such as “Do Nothing” and “Too Much Too Young” by the Specials and “Mirror In The Bathroom” by The Beat represent the Two-Tone music scene that had emerged at the time and changed the UK musically, culturally, and politically. The film also includes “Love Will Tear Us Apart” by Joy Division and “Spellbound” by Siouxsie and the Banshees that reflect the era’s Goth scene.

“If you’re a kid who grew up in London, that was your music,” says Ross. “It was much like the era before, punk rock – it was an agent of change, and I think for the better. There was an inclusive aspect to it that transformed culture in Britain.”

Continues Mendes, “Everyone was part of a tribe and you felt that people stood for something. Music and culture weren’t as available as they are today, you had to make an effort to go and listen and see. You had to go out and find it in the world.”

The musical score is by Trent Reznor and Atticus Ross, who collaborate for the first time with Mendes after garnering acclaim for their work on films as diverse as The Social Network, Mid90s, Bird Box, Soul, Mank, and the television series “Watchmen.”

“We’ve been intrigued by and admirers of Sam’s work. And the idea of seeing what would happen, and seeing what would rub off on us from him, was exciting,” says Reznor. “It’s inspiring to be around people who are firing on all cylinders and putting their all into a project. When we were introduced to Sam, he exceeded any expectations we had about his integrity and his intellect.”

Mendes brought Reznor and Ross into the process of the film very early – while he was still writing the movie. “It feels like you’ve been invited into the secret chamber,” explains Ross. “We spoke to Sam at least once a month, if not every couple of weeks, for six months before he picked up the camera. He shared a lot of deeply personal information, the essence of which we would need to emotionally express with music.”

The composers note that they have “every sound in the world” available to them, so the first step was to set limitations for what felt right for EMPIRE OF LIGHT. “Our first couple of rounds of composition often happen before there is picture,” Reznor explains. “We absorb as much information and clues as we can, and we sit and think very editorially initially about what palette would be good for the score. What feels like the DNA of this world? We’ll choose some instruments or approaches and we’ll spend a few weeks improvising, composing, putting it in the blender of music that feels like it’s happening in this world.”

For Reznor and Ross, Mendes was precise in his direction, kind in his praise, and inspiring to others to raise their game. “Sam is so clear in what he wants to say and express,” explains Reznor. “There was still a freedom to compose – he’s not holding our hands – but in terms of the narrative, the feeling, and the emotional journey, he was laser-focused on keeping it with the right sentiment behind it.”

That demand – an inspiration to do one’s very best work – made EMPIRE OF LIGHT Reznor and Ross’s most challenging score so far, they say. “I think when we started this project, we thought, ‘this won’t be too hard to pull off.’ But it was challenging throughout. I’m up for a good challenge, and we got what we asked for. There was no faking it. The stakes were high. I found it intimidating in a lot of ways. But that’s what made it a cherished experience. I’m incredibly proud of how it turned out, and came out a better composer.”

One cue that Reznor and Ross are particularly proud of is one of the movie’s first scenes, as Hilary opens the Empire. Mendes had written in the script that it would be set to a particular song by jazz pianist Bill Evans. “When I heard that piece at the beginning of the film, I sensed nostalgia, comfort, and it worked well. But as composers, we wondered if we could replace that with an original composition, one that might be less nostalgic, where you’re less certain of what this is, to help set the tone of the score – it might change the expectation of what you’re watching from the beginning.”

“Bill Evans, rightly or wrongly, was putting us in a place where you might make some assumptions about the film,” adds Ross. “With the opening now, you’re not sure what’s coming next. We could tell that Sam was unsure about placing it there, and 24 hours later, he said, ‘I watched it in an actual cinema, and you were right. It made the scale of the film feel different’.”

Reznor and Ross’ score is largely piano-based, but that only tells half the story. On top of the piano compositions are human voices, strings, and other instruments, which provide a framework in which the piano sits – and those came about in a method unique to Reznor and Ross. “The score is traditional-sounding; it’s not experimental by nature,” says Reznor. “If you listen closely, there’s a lot more going on than just the piano. It’s all around the edges and it’s subtle – a nice, warm orchestration around the foundation of the piano.”

The composers used tape loops to provide that subtle layer. “We had a microphone going into a looper pedal that we’d put on record for two hours at a time. And in that mic, I’ll pick up a cello. It starts to mesh into a texture,” Reznor explains. “And it might be a string line that gets in there, it might be vocals, it might be anything that happens to be laying around the studio at that time. The end result is very organic and natural. It sounds familiar, comfortable. That felt exciting to us and we were able to shape it into the right kind of atmosphere.”

These techniques give a texture that underscores the film’s emotional experience. “Hilary’s journey is from one kind of love into another one, and into her own acceptance. We’re hoping audiences can feel truly transported, that they’re not aware of their surroundings, and lost in the film.”

EMPIRE OF LIGHT is a valentine not just to movies, but to movies as exhibited in the cinema. “As Stephen says in the movie, “That little beam of light is escape”, and I believe it’s a human need to escape life, to let our imaginations be released to find another part of ourselves either in books, or music, or theatre, or in this case in the cinema,” Mendes explains. “EMPIRE OF LIGHT was definitely inspired by the concern that people weren’t going to go to these places anymore. We created these temples, to visit these lit dreams, these spells that filmmakers cast. Are they now just going to lie empty?” Adds Harris, “They’re a beacon and a place that bring people together, that’s what cinema always should do and can do. It’s a place where people go who maybe don’t fit in elsewhere but can find a home and joy in that shared experience of watching a film together.”

Continues Mendes, “This group of people in EMPIRE OF LIGHT find friendship and all come together in this extraordinary building. At its core, the film deals with the families we create around us that help get us through life – and how people are drawn together to take care of each other, choosing kindness, compassion and empathy. I guess it’s worth remembering in this new world we find ourselves in...”

ROGER DEAKINS, ASC, BSC (Director of Photography)

Sir Roger Deakins, CBE, ASC, BSC is an Academy Award-winner, published author, and the first cinematographer to be knighted at Windsor Castle. Before spending almost half a century working in film, growing up in Devon in the early 1960s, Deakins only knew films as a viewer. He had no connection to the art of making films. His interest in painting led him to Bath Academy of Art, where he developed a passion for capturing images through a lens rather than with a brush. Deakins thought he might find a career as a photographer but a chance encounter with a fellow student took him in a different direction. In 1971, the National Film School opened its doors and the possibility of a career in film became more of a reality. After initially being rejected, an even more determined Deakins was accepted the following year. He has gone on to shoot documentaries and an estimated 70 feature films. His work has taken him across the globe to India, Eritrea, Kenya, Zimbabwe, Budapest, Berlin, New Mexico, and the list goes on. One of Deakins’ first professional assignments was a documentary about an entrant in the Whitbread Round the World Yacht Race, where he spent nine months at sea. Over his tremendous career, Deakins has developed working relationships with top filmmakers such as the Coen Brothers, Sam Mendes, and Denis Villeneuve. He has been nominated for 15 Academy Awards and won twice – winning for Villeneuve’s Blade Runner 2049 and Mendes’ 1917. Deakins has also received five BAFTAs and five American Society of Cinematographers Awards – in addition to earning the 2011 ASC Lifetime Achievement Award. Not even a historic pandemic could slow down the legendary cinematographer. Beginning in April of 2020, Deakins started the “Team Deakins” podcast with his wife, James. Together they’ve recorded over 160 episodes, interviewing different filmmakers, and discussing the art of film. In November 2021, Deakins published Byways – his first book of still photography containing personal black-and-white stills from 1971 to the present. At the beginning of 2022, he was knighted by Prince Charles at Windsor Castle.

TRENT REZNOR & ATTICUS ROSS (Music by)

Trent Reznor formed Rock and Roll Hall of Fame inductees Nine Inch Nails in Ohio in 1988 and, over the next 30 years, proceeded to sell over 30 million records worldwide. The band's studio albums include the multi-Platinum releases Pretty Hate Machine (1989), The Downward Spiral (1994), and The Fragile (1999), which became the first NIN album to reach No. 1 on the US Billboard 200, a feat mirrored by With Teeth (2005). The 1992 EP Broken yielded two Grammy awards and also achieved Platinum status.

In 2008, Reznor teamed with Atticus Ross, his now-partner in NIN, and began a prolific career in composing music for film. Their first project, David Fincher's The Social Network, earned the pair an Oscar and a Golden Globe.

Reznor and Ross have continued to compose music for a diverse array of film and television projects, including the acclaimed "Watchmen" series for HBO, which earned the duo an Emmy for Outstanding Music Composition for a series. Reznor and Ross won numerous awards (including an Oscar, Grammy, Golden Globe, and British Academy Film Award) for the score for the 2020 animated Pixar film Soul. Their score for David Fincher's biopic Mank received nominations for many of the same awards, in the same year. These projects are a testament to the fact that their talents are not beholden to any singular genre.

In 2013, Reznor helped to develop and launch the Beats Music streaming service in his role as Chief Creative Officer. When Apple purchased Beats, the tech giant hired Reznor so that he would stay involved as they built the Apple Music platform, recognizing his value not just to the app, but his unique perspective as an artist.

NIN experienced a pop culture resurgence in 2019, reaching a fresh audience through some unlikely sources. In addition to a savvy pairing with Captain Marvel – which saw the superhero donning a vintage NIN shirt throughout much of the film -- the band returned to the charts through a clever cover (a pop makeover of "Head Like a Hole" called "On a Roll," which was performed by fictional pop star Ashley O, depicted by Miley Cyrus in the show "Black Mirror") and as co-writers and co-producers on the longest-reigning No. 1 record in the history of Billboard ("Old Town Road").

The band continues to set stages across the world ablaze with its 2022 tour. After NIN headlined Boston Calling on two consecutive nights, Boston Magazine marveled, "how cool was Trent Reznor and the rest of the band this weekend? Just off the charts, really." Praising their "unbridled intensity," Kerrang hailed the London show as "one of the year's most exceptional gigs...[from] a live band that, on form like this, is inarguably the best in the world. Bow down."
